“The meaning of the cross, of redemptive suffering, appears in a different light for those who suffer and are killed as part of the struggle for justice.

Too often Christians have treated the suffering Christ as some kind of cosmic legal transaction with God to pay for the sins of humanity, as though anyone’s sufferings and death could actually “pay for” others’ sins!

As one struggles against evil, one also risks suffering and becomes vulnerable to retaliation and violence to those who are intent on keeping the present system intact.

By risking suffering and even death on behalf of a new society, we also awaken hope.

In the shining stars:
Christ, our light.
In the burning bush:
Christ, our light.
In the pillar of fire:
Christ, our light.”*
