A WORD FROM THE PASTOR

This is Part V of a series of Bulletin columns on the early history of the Catholic Church in Oregon. We are at the point where the Oregon Trail comes into play, contributing enormously to the population of the Northwest while bringing prosperity and development to the future states. The trail extended roughly 2,000 miles from Independence, Missouri, to Oregon City on the Willamette River. By the time the railroads arrived in the 1860s and 1870s, 400,000 people had traveled the trail (and its tributaries) to the Oregon Country and to the greater West beyond.

Aside from trappers and early merchants, the missionaries were the first to traverse a path from the east coast to the west coast. Marcus Whitman was among the first, who, in 1835, set out to demonstrate that the westward trail to Oregon could be traveled safely. Returning to the east, Whitman set out again, now with his new bride, Narcissa. They went further west than Whitman's first trip, using Indian trails to cross the Rockies, and finally reaching Fort Walla Walla and Fort Vancouver in 1836.

The western passage of emigrants began in 1839 when a small group of men departed Peoria, Illinois, with the intention of colonizing the Oregon Country. In 1840, Joseph Meek and Robert Newall, formerly fur trappers and mountain men, headed west. Their wagons were the first to reach the Columbia River overland, opening the final leg of the Oregon Trail to wagon traffic. In 1841, the Bartleson-Bidwell Party was the first emigrant group to attempt a wagon crossing from Missouri to the west (half the group headed for California).

The number of emigrants greatly expanded in 1843. Called "The Great Migration of 1843," nearly 1,000 people, 120 wagons, and thousands of livestock left for Oregon on May 22nd. When the emigrants were told to leave their wagons at Fort Hall (near Pocatello, Idaho) and use pack animals, Marcus Whitman (who had joined the group) disagreed and volunteered to lead the wagons to Oregon. The biggest obstacle was the Blue Mountains, where they had to clear a path through thick forest. At The Dalles, the wagons had to be taken apart and floated down the hazardous Columbia River. They arrived in the Willamette Valley in October. The Barlow Road was constructed around Mt. Hood in 1846, providing a rough but passable trail to the Willamette Valley.

The covered wagon (a prairie schooner) was the single most important component for a successful trip along the Oregon Trail. It was also necessary to depart in April or May in order to arrive in Oregon before the winter snows. Once the settlers arrived, the Organic Laws of Oregon (1843) granted 640 acres (at no cost) to married couples and 320 acres to an unmarried settler. As the years passed, the Oregon Trail became a heavily used corridor between Missouri and the Columbia River. With the building of the Transcontinental Railroad in 1869, the heyday of the Oregon Trail had come to an end.

The window that celebrates the people of South America and their many Saints contains portraits of Saint Rose of Lima, Patroness of the Americas, Archbishop Turibius de Mogrovejo and two beloved Dominican brothers, Saint Martin de Porres and Saint John Macias. The second window, from the front, on the East wall of the Cathedral.

The first native born saint of the New World, Isabel de Santa Marie de Flores, was born in Lima, Peru in 1586. She took the name Rose when Archbishop Turibius confirmed her. Constant prayer and the practice of extreme penance and mortification characterized her life. Much of her time was spent growing flowers and doing needlework to support her family and this is echoed in the window. She is the patroness of South
